

Ways to supplement your income: Nanny

Business model	Qualities required	Training required	If you're not sure yet...	Typical working hours	Location	Regulatory requirements	Projected income
Working as a nanny usually involves taking up an employed position within a family's home. However, nannies who work for more than two families at the same time, or work in a number of temporary roles, can be self-employed as a registered childminder. Find out more about becoming a nanny. Some nanning roles also require the individual to help around the home. Find out more about the role of a nanny.	Love of working with children. Confidence, empathy, flexibility, creativity, reliability. Good communication skills.	All nannies should have completed paediatric first aid training. Nannies are not required to have childcare qualifications unless they join Ofsted's voluntary register. As a registered childminder, you already have the qualifications, training and experience that many parents would be looking for.	You could try some ad-hoc childcare for one of the families you already work with to see how you feel about working in someone else's home.	A nanny would usually be employed by the family and receive a salary. This would involve negotiating a contract, including working hours, with the family. Think about whether you are happy to work irregular hours, such as evenings and weekends.	Nannies work in the family's home and would also take the children on outings with parents' permission, as you do with your childminding business.	All nannies should have a DBS check, up to date first aid certificate and insurance that covers working in someone else's home. Check government guidance on working safely in someone else's home during coronavirus.	Nanning roles vary depending on your level of experience, the family or families you're working for, and the area you live in. Nannies typically earn between around £10 and £14 an hour. Becoming an employee would mean that you are entitled to benefits such as holiday pay. However, if you work for more than two families at the same time, this would come under your role as a self-employed registered childminder. If you do take on a salaried role alongside your childminding business, be sure to update HMRC.